DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Old South Meeting House, located at the northeast corner of Washington and Milk Streets in downtown Boston, was built as the second home of the Third Church in Boston, gathered in 1669. The original building, known as the "Cedar Meeting House" because of its construction material, was demolished when it became too small for the growing congregation and the present structure was erected on the same site in 1729-30. The new building was designed by Robert Twelves and constructed by Joshua Blanchard, a master mason who later (1740-42) erected the original Faneuil Hall.

Though retaining the traditional side-entrance plan of the 17th century New England meeting house, Old South was undoubtedly influenced by the Early Georgian style of the recently completed (1723) Old North (Christ Church). A large structure for its day, Old South consists of a gable-roofed rectangle with a square tower at the center of its western (short) side. The brick masonry is laid in Flemish bond; belt courses surround the main block and tower at each floor level. Like Old North, Old South is lighted by two tiers of round-arched, multi-pane windows. The top of the three-stage tower is surrounded by a dentil cornice and a balustrade, above which rises a three-stage octagonal spire 180 feet high. (Old South's spire was copied in at least six other New England churches, the most notable of them constructed at Farmington, Connecticut in 1771). Entrances are located in the north, west, and south faces of the tower and in an enclosed, pedimented porch at the center of the south (long) side of the building; each consists of double paneled doors topped by a fanlight, the whole recessed in a molded surround.

The original interior of Old South followed the pattern of the early meeting houses with the main entrance at the side (served by the doorways in the tower). The paneled box pews were oriented toward a high pulpit with suspended sounding board centered on the long north wall; balustraded galleries extended around the other three sides, carried on Doric columns set on high plinths. A central aisle led across the auditorium from the pulpit to a second entrance at the center of the long south wall. A broad cornice bordered the coved ceiling. The windows were recessed in the walls and fitted with louvered blinds.

Old South suffered serious damage during the British occupation of Boston in 1774-76. At the order of General John Burgoyne, the pulpit, pews, and all other interior fittings except the eastern gallery were torn out and used for fuel, and the building itself was turned into a riding school for the King's cavalry. By 1783 the Old South congregation had reassembled and in that year the interior of the building was restored.

A number of changes were made in the auditorium during the 19th century, including the addition of second galleries at the eastern and western ends. Supported on attenuated columns (possibly of cast iron), the new galleries repeat the balustraded rails of the older ones but carry bands

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Old South Meeting House, erected at Boston, Massachusetts in 1729-30, is an excellent example of a colonial brick church in which an Early Georgian exterior is combined with the traditional seating plan of the 17th century New England meeting house. Because of its large seating capacity, Old South became the scene of a number of significant town meetings and assemblies (many of them reconvened here when Faneuil Hall proved too small for the large crowds they attracted) in the period just prior to the outbreak of the American Revolution. Among the most important of them was the heated session of December 16, 1773, which culminated in the Boston Tea Party.

Old South Meeting House was built as the second home of Boston's Third Church, replacing the original building on the same site. During the British occupation of Boston, the building was stripped of its interior fittings and used as a riding school for the King's cavalry. Restored in 1783, Old South continued to be used for religious purposes until 1872 when the Third Church moved to a new building in the developing Back Bay area. Saved from demolition by public protest and a successful fund raising drive in 1876, the Meeting House was turned over to the newly incorporated Old South Association in Boston, which has since operated the building as a museum.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Boston's Third or Old South Church, the third body of Congregationalists gathered in the town, was established in 1669 and that year constructed its first building, known as the "Cedar Meeting House", at the corner of Washington and Milk Streets. In 1687 Governor Edmund Andros commandeered the meeting house for Anglican services; Judge Samuel Sewall appeared in 1696 to make public confession of his guilt in the Salem witchcraft delusion of 1692; and in 1706 Benjamin Franklin was baptized there. The South Church became Old South in 1717 when the New South Church was completed at the junction of Summer Street and Blind Lane (now part of Bedford Street). By 1729 the "Cedar Meeting House" was too small to accomodate the Old South congregation and it was replaced by a larger brick structure on the same site.

The new Old South Meeting House, dedicated on April 26, 1730, was designed of Doric triglyphs on their lower edges. The present ornate pulpit arrangement also appears to date from the early 19th century. The pulpit itself, a wineglass shape, is set at the center-front of a high, semi-circular platform. The base of this structure is decorated by Corinthian columns carrying a full entablature with running floral band which forms the railing of the platform. Between the columns are carved panels, two of which contain doors to a staircase leading up to the platform. A carved octagonal sounding board is suspended above the pulpit. On the wall behind it is a single window set in a recess framed by Corinthian columns carrying a round arch.

Though no serious damage was done by the attempted demolition of 1876 (see significance), some repair of the Meeting House was necessary. Since that time the Old South Association in Boston has operated the building as a museum. Display cases have been installed under the galleries along the east and south walls and in the northwest corner; a sales desk and office have been created in the southwest corner. The latter unfortunately have a negative effect on the historic character of the auditorium. Though a subway entrance is located immediately north of the building, it is set well back from the street and constitutes only a minor intrusion on the historic property.

by Robert Twelves and constructed by Joshua Blanchard, the master mason who later built the original Faneuil Hall (1742). Though it retained the traditional side entrance "auditorium plan" of the 17th century meeting house, the building was undoubtedly influenced by the Early Georgian design of the recently completed (1723) Christ Church (Old North) and, like it, had two tiers of round-arched windows and a square projecting tower with 3-stage spire. Old South's spire, octagonal rather than square like that of Old North, was copied in at least six other New England churches, most notably that built at Farmington, Connecticut in 1771.

The practice of holding large public meetings at Old South began in 1761, when Faneuil Hall was seriously damaged by fire and the town meetings usually held there were temporarily transferred to the meeting house. Thereafter, when town meetings and other gatherings drew crowds too large to be accommodated at the reconstructed Faneuil Hall or the Second Town House (Old State House) they were reconvened at Old South. Among these was the assembly of June 14, 1768, moderated by James Otis, which compelled Governor Bernard to secure the removal of a warship that had been stationed in Boston harbor to enforce British impressment and customs regulations. A day-long session following the "Boston Massacre" in March, 1770, forced the withdrawal of the British garrison to Castle William in the harbor.

Of the many protest meetings held at Old South between the passage of the Townsend Acts in 1767 and the outbreak of the Revolution in 1775, perhaps the most significant were those late in 1773 which culminated in the Boston Tea Party. On November 29 and 30 and again on December 14 and 16, several thousand inhabitants of Boston and neighboring towns gathered at the meeting house to prevent the landing of three cargoes of tea shipped to Boston by the East India Company under authority of the Tea Act of May, 1773. When word reached Old South on the evening of the 16th that Governor Hutchinson had refused to allow the three ships--the Dartmouth, Beaver, and Eleanor--to leave port without unloading the tea, Samuel Adams rose to his feet and proclaimed, "This meeting can do nothing more to save the country". At that pre-arranged signal, war whoops broke out from the galleries and the meeting dissolved. A hundred or more men and youths, thinly disguised as Indians, rushed from Old South to Griffin's Wharf and within a few hours dumped some $18,000's worth of tea into Boston harbor.

When the British occupied Boston at the outbreak of the Revolution, the anti-tea sessions and other radical gatherings at Old South were not forgotten. In 1775, at the order of General John Burgoyne, all the interior fittings except the east gallery were removed from the meeting house and the building was turned into a riding school for the King's cavalry. Old South's congregation reassembled after the British evacuation of Boston in 1776 and by 1783 was able to restore the interior of the meeting house. A number of changes were made in the building during the 19th century, including the addition of second galleries at the eastern and western ends.

By the late 1860's much of the Old South congregation had moved to Boston's new and fashionable Back Bay district and in 1869 the Old South Society, the corporate body of the church, purchased land for a building there (New Old South Church, dedicated in 1875). However, the congregation continued to worship at the old meeting house until it was damaged by the great fire of 1872. The building was then leased to the United States Government to house the Boston Post Office, whose own building had been destroyed in the fire. The area around Old South had been given over almost entirely to business and the land on which the meeting house stood had become extremely valuable. The congregation had attempted to preserve the historic building by selling it to the Massachusetts Historical Society in 1872, but that organization had not had sufficient funds to purchase at a competitive price. Thus, when the government lease expired, the congregation decided to demolish the meeting house and sell the land for commercial purposes.

Despite public opposition, the building (exclusive of the cornerstone and tower clock) was sold at auction on June 8, 1876, for $1,350, subject to removal within 60 days. The demolition crew was beginning its work when, on June 11, George W. Simmons, a dealer in ready-made clothing, bought the right to hold the building uninjured for seven days. During this brief period energetic efforts to save the building were organized. A mass meeting was held at Old South on June 14, at which Wendell Phillips delivered a resounding address in the florid style for which he was noted; a committee formed to solicit contributions received subscriptions for several thousand dollars on the spot. The first direct step in the case was taken when 20 Boston ladies purchased the building for $3,500. On September 15, the congregation agreed to sell the land for $400,000 in cash; the New England Mutual Life Insurance Company took a $225,000 mortgage, the committee paid over $75,000 which it had collected, and Mrs. Augustus Hemenway assured the success of the project with her contribution of the last $100,000.

The Old South Association in Boston was incorporated in May, 1877 to hold the meeting house as an historic site and has maintained the building since that time. After necessary repairs were made, exhibits of objects connected with the building and the Revolution were installed and Old South was opened to the public. Special events were organized to raise the money needed to amortize the mortgage on the property. Lectures, balls, and fairs were held; Emerson, Holmes, Longfellow, Lowell and Whittier gave readings of their poetry; and the young Thomas Edison exhibited his new phonograph. In 1879 John Fiske presented a popular series of lectures on American history, which subsequently developed into the Old South Work in History program, a lecture series designed specifically for teachers and school-children. In 1888 the Old South Association began publication of its notable and extensive collection of "Old South Leaflets", reproductions of significant original documents with pertinent historical and bibliographical notes.
